E, e, the ſecond vowel, and fifth letter in the alphabet, receives its origin from the Hebrew ה, to which it anſwers in alphabetical order, and from which alſo it takes its figure: for by turning it to the right, to comply with our way of writeing, it ſtands thus ה; and by takeing the ſeparate perpending line, and joining it tranſverſe to the foot, that it may anſwer the top line, we eaſyly form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. ϵ, which our Saxon anceſtors borrowed from them without any varyation. This letter was both long and ſhort in the old Greek, as it is ſtill in moſt languages, who pronounce λέγω, and λήγω, though of a quite different ſenſe, and innumerable ſuch words, after the ſame manner; from which ambiguity often ariſeth. To obviate this, and perhaps ſome other inconveniencies, they invented H to expreſs the long ſound, or, to ſpeak more properly, b [illegible] ir alphabet of one of its letters, which were but ſixteen, and ſupplyed the want of it by a mark of aſpira-tion, writeing ἠθμὸς for HETHMOΣ. But this only could ſupply the want of their baniſhed H in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themſelves under a neceſſity of inventing three letters more to expreſs it in the middle, namely Θ, X, Φ. But of this ſee more in the letter H.

To proceed, this letter E in old Greek was pronounced like η, as ο was ſounded like ω. In Latin, it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourſe with, all its ſiſter vowels, and they likewiſe with it; e. g. into a, as from ſero comes ſatus, from reor, ratus; ſo alſo in like manner a is changed into e, as from tracto comes detrecto; e inte i, as from emo comes eximo and perimo; and in like manner i into e, as for inſtance eligans, which was writen by the ancients for elegans, as Gellius informs us, 11, 2; and in ſome words theſe vowels are uſed indiſcriminately, as heri or here. Auguſtus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Inſtit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writeing other words, as ſibe and quaſe for ſibi and quaſi. Thus alſo upon a ſuppoſition that this way of writeing came neareſt to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; whence the Romans in the three like caſes of the plural number of the third declenſion, writ many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accuſative and ablative ſing. of the ſame declenſion, in many words theſe terminations are indifferently uſed, as might be ſhown by innumerable examples. That e and o alſo are thus interchangeably uſed, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in the Greek words λέγω, λόγος, τρέπω, τρόπος; and ſo alſo o into e, as from vos comes veſter; to omit that voſtrum and veſtrum, advorſum and adverſum are read in pure writers. Laſtly, the ſame is likewiſe to be obſerved with reſpect to e and u, u and e, as for inſtance in percello, perculi, perculſum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the compoſition of diphthongs, e is a prepoſitive only in two words, namely hei and heu; but is ſubjunctive after innumerable words in a, as aedes, aeger, &c. It is ſubjunctive alſo after o in words derived from the Greek diphthong οι, as for inſtance in οἶστρος, which makes oeſtrus, and Οἰδίπους, Oedipus. In the contracted notes of the ancients, E. is put for Eſt, Ennius, Edilis; E. B. Ejus Bona; E. D. Ejus Domus; E.E. Ejus Etas; E. F. Ejus fecit; E. F. vel E. FIL. Ejus filius.

F f Roman, and now in common uſe, F f Ital. which alſo is in modern uſe, 𝔉 𝔣 in old Engliſh, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern uſe, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the ſixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may ſeem to have loſt its place, and figure in the Greek alphabet now uſed; but however its place is ſupplyed in the numerals by ϛ, which is called Βαῦ ἐπίσημον, and its power of being a vowel, conſonant, and quieſcent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is ſtill otherwiſe made up. This ſixth Cadmean letter anſwering to ו was firſt turned to the left, as its original, thus, ꟻ, and afterwards to the right F. The Æolians uſed the former way, and turned it upſide down, thus, Ⅎ. Theſe People uſed it before ſoft vowels, writeing Ⅎοῖνος for οἶνος; for an aſpirate, as, Ⅎολος for ὅλος; alſo in the middle of words to ſtop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their colliſion, as οℲις for ὄϊς. The old Latins alſo received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and ſeting it upright as we now uſe it. They, as well as the Æolians, uſed it for h both in the begining and middle of words, writeing fordeum for hordeum, veſo for veho; and ſometimes turned it into v, inſtead of οℲις, writeing ovis, thereby ſhowing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the ſupineneſs, or ignorance, of Grammarians, was, and ſo continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, that that there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into diſuſe among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they claped upon words which anciently had begun with the letter h, or its ſubſtitute Ⅎ, and the other half upon ſuch as began with a ſoft vowel. The Latins alſo, both in the begining and middle of words aſpirated, reſumed the old letter h, inſtead of foſtis writing hoſtis, and inſtead of traſo, traho. But though its place and analogous uſe favour its deſcent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be ſaid for its pedigree from the Hebrew פ, and ſo make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure it may be as well formed from ו turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declineing line, as above; or from the final ף by turning it, and joining to the middle a ſmall line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Γ by takeing its ſhort leg and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the ſound and power of this letter, we cannot but obſerve that it comes nearer to the ſound of פ phe, and φ phi, than ve and vi, as our Weſtern people ſound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, פ is more generally changed into f, than v. Thus from the Hebrew פרא comes the Greek φὴρ, and the Latin fera; from פור, fors; from פוך, fucus, &c. But ſince from what hath been ſaid may be gathered its relation to ו in place, and primitive uſe, and perhaps in its figure, but that in ſound at leaſt it ſeems more nearly related to the Hebrew פ or the Greek Φ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reaſon may be given for ſuch a concluſion, why the ancient Greeks ſo early diſmiſſed this letter: namely, becauſe haveing otherwiſe ſupplyed the uſes it had from the primitive ו, finding its ſound nearly related to their Φ, they concluded they had no further occaſion for it, and ſo left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever ſome great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the firſt rank alſo. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er (for ſo by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this cuſtom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itſelf, nor in the Hebrew or Greek tongues, who ſay not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticiſm, perverſeneſs, ignorance, or inadvertency, of Grammarians. And indeed, if this cuſtom would prove it a ſemivowel, we muſt alſo adopt s into the family of the liquids, and what is ſtill more abſurd, make a ſemivowel of two conſonants, whereof at leaſt they confeſs one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex, juſt with as much reaſon as they call f, ef. Beſides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the ſame ſyllable, as in flos, fraus, &c. and ſurely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a ſyllable. G g Latin, 𝔊 𝔤 in the old black Engliſh letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γγ, in both which tongues it is the third Letter, was not in uſe amongſt the Romans till about the ſecond Punick war, being firſt introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admitt it into its third place, invaded by the uſurper c, and now ſettled by preſcription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and h, which, upon occaſion, mutually ſerve each other. But though c may juſtly be called an uſurper with reſpect to its order in the alphabet, we muſt allow it a kind of right, by haveing been inveſted with the power and ſound of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who writ pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwiſe, after the admiſſion of g, they would ſtill have retained the priſtine c in theſe and the like words. If any ſhould aſk how the ancient Romans could know before this letter g came into uſe, where and in what words to pronounce either ſound? it muſt be anſwered, by uſe alone: For that this might be known ſo, may be exemplifyed by a hundred inſtances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loſs how to ſound 𝔱𝔥𝔞𝔱 and 𝔱𝔥𝔞𝔱𝔠𝔥, 𝔱𝔥𝔢 and 𝔱𝔥𝔢𝔪𝔢, 𝔱𝔥𝔦𝔰 and 𝔱𝔥𝔦𝔰𝔱𝔩𝔢, 𝔱𝔥𝔬𝔲 and 𝔱𝔥𝔬𝔲𝔰𝔞𝔫𝔡, 𝔱𝔥𝔲𝔰 and 𝔱𝔥𝔲𝔪𝔟; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed muſt be owned, that to give ſeveral ſounds to one and the ſame letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above inſtance, more difficult to be learned, and eſpecially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans ſeem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverſe; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more eaſy; we have laid aſide þ and ȝ which we had, to make ours more difficult; which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, becauſe of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately alſo from the ſame letter; others from the cognate ק, which, when turned to the right, Cן much reſembles G. I ſhould think it more probably received its form immediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, ſince, as I before obſerved, the letter c originally had the power and ſound of the after invented g, as well as its own; and ſo when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reaſon differ no more from c in figure, than in ſound. For indeed theſe letters differ only thus, c is a ſofter g, as g is a harder c. Hence it comes to paſs, that in declineing, the harder g before a vowel is before a conſonant changed into the ſofter c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reaſon, jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenſes, are read before the formative ſ, juncſi, recſi, tecſi, not jungſi, regſi, tegſi; for ſo, if we may believe Iſidore, before the age of Auguſtus ſuch words were uſually writen, not by x; which, being only a more compendious way of writeing, made Quintilian ſay, Inſtit. 1, 6. that the Romans might have been without it; as they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as in recs, apecs. The letter g ſometimes alſo ſeems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber, and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is ſo cloſe, that in ſome words either of them may be uſed; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigeſimus, or viceſimus, from viginti; and they are often changed into each other: for as from viginti, comes viceſimus; ſo from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the ſecond rank of the mutes, is changed not only into κ but into χ alſo, as in the ſecond conjugation, which conſiſts of this order of the mutes, may plainly be obſerved; for example lego, f. lecſo, p. lelecha; inſtead of legſo, lelegha, the harder ſound. I cannot forbear to obſerve here, that both the Greeks and Romans allways, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, ſounding γένος and genus, γίγας and gigas, as we do in 𝔤𝔢𝔱 and 𝔤𝔦𝔳𝔢, never as we do in 𝔤𝔢𝔫𝔢𝔯𝔞𝔱𝔦𝔬𝔫 and 𝔤𝔦𝔫𝔤𝔢𝔯; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great diſcouragement to thoſe who deſire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different ſound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almoſt as unintelligible as our Engliſh. H h, English black letter 𝕳 𝖍, English Saxon h, which ſeems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ח. The Phœnicians, moſt ancient Greeks, and Romans, uſed the ſame figure with our Engliſh H, which in the ſeries of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The leſs ancient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E ſhould denote both the ſhort and long ſounds, as their anceſtors were, witneſs the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately diſcovered Sigean monument, haveing conſulted to expreſs the long ſound of E, inveſted it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to ſupply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aſpiration over the head of its vowel, writeing ἅμα, ὁδὸς, &c. inſtead of the old Ionic HAMA and HOΔOΣ; endeavouring, I ſay, for though they did it conveniently over a vowel begining a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writeing Ἐνοδία and Ταὼς, for ENHOΔIA and TAHΩΣ; and where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it ſomewhat prepoſterouſly, for PHAMNOΣ, PHTΩP, ΠΥPPHOΣ, &c. writeing Ῥάμνος, Ῥήτωρ, Πυῤῥος, where the mark of aſpiration is put before, but ſounded after the conſonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very ancient, was probably the reaſon why ſome of the ancient grammarians, and among the reſt our great Maſter Priſcian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument againſt it, is, that it is only a pure aſpiration, haveing nothing to aſſert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if ſufficient, would alſo recommend the numeral notes to the ſame honour. But with due reverence to ſo great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name alſo in the original, and other the moſt ancient dialects thereof, is very evident. Beſides, if its being an aſpiration proves it to be no letter, the original ſofter א and ה, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher ע and ח the parent of H, muſt be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and ſurely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a ſyllable, the latter the characteriſtick of a whole word, two quite different things. But he inſiſts, "If it be a letter, it muſt either be a vowel or a conſonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a conſtant retainer to that family, may be eaſyly granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as ſome have, from its near approach to the nature of a ſemivowel. But ſure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aſpirated mutes φ, ϑ, χ, which were not anciently in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporateing with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than a hard aſpirate, veſted with the power of its mother ח, and plainly the ſame as χ, that is, no other than a hard aſpiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly ſubſtituted for it, as χάλω, halo, χάω, hio, χάμαι, humi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for nihi, nihil; which alſo may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the ſecond order of the mutes, which conſtitute their ſecond conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the ſame termination; for as πλέκω, λέγω, τρέχω, move into ξ in the future ſenſe; ſo dico, lego, veho, move into xi in the perfect tenſe. But others think it no letter, becauſe the Latin Poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves ſo much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpoſe: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much diſregarded by the Latin poets; and eſpecially the final s, which even before a conſonant, was anciently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aſpiration is frequently expreſſed in Latin by s, as ἥμι, ſemi, ἕξ, ſex; and are theſe therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aſpirate is ſet before all the vowels, as habeo, hebeo, hio, honoro, humeo; but after no conſonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philoſophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the ſame uſe had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. ſepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; the two firſt whereof ſeem to have been ſo pronounced by ſome before and in Cicero's time, as he expreſsly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and ſubjoining h to conſonants and vowels was indeed uſed in pronunciation, but condemned by the beſt judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witneſſeth, laughing Arrius to ſcorn, Ep. 82, for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinſidias. Cicero truly ſoon after, knowing very well that the ancients uſed not this aſpirate inſertion, for ſome time uſed to ſay pulcrior, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet ſeems afterwards to have eſpouſed the aſpirate way, at leaſt in ſome words, as judgeing the ſound more maſculine and ſprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himſelf, but more expreſsly from A. Gellius N. A 2, 3. this cuſtom was introduced. However, this way, though ſpareingly, and in few words uſed at firſt, grew into ſuch a ridiculous exceſs, that ſome ſaid chenturia, chorona, præcho, vid. Quint. Inſtit. Orat. 1, 5. Concerning the intercourſe which h hath with the Æolic digamma, ſee the letter F. H. in the notes of the ancients, notes hic, hæc, hoc, honor, honeſtus, hæres, homo, habet, hora; HA. I J.

I i, and in the black Engliſh letter 𝕴 𝔦, in the Latin I i, in Greek with little varyation Ι ι, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel haveing the ſmalleſt ſound as well as figure, is moſt fitly ſuited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epiſt. 1, 109.

Nec mihi ſunt vires inimicos pellere tectis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel ſeven times, and the next ſmall ſound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the ſubject riſeth, as in the ſublime, the frequent uſe of it is to be avoided. For this reaſon Virgil hath in the Æneid writ olli for illi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgicks. Hence alſo comes the frequent change into u by the ancients, to ſtrengthen the ſound, as Jupiter Optumus Maxumus, and many other inſtances, which might be given out of the old manuſcripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly ſhow. This vowel in Latin compounds is alſo ſubſtituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tango, facio. The ſound of this to the next ſmall vowel e is ſo near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expreſſed them both by one character, before the invention of points. And the changes of i into e, and vice versâ, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be obſerved; as in μίνθα, mentha, τέγγω, tingo. Add alſo, that in many words which are purely Latin theſe vowels are indifferently writen, as magè and magìs, herè and herì; Magè pollens aër, Lucr. 4, 344. Res hodie minor eſt herè quàm fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea, many words in the accuſative and ablative caſes ſing. of the third declenſion end in em or im, e or i. Alſo in our Engliſh tongue we write indifferently imploy, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the ſame kind. In making the Latin diphthongs, as in Greeks, this vowel is ſubjunctive to the reſt, as aio, hei, hoi, hui, Ilythia. In numerals this, as being the ſmalleſt letter, is put for the ſmalleſt number, I, one, II, two, &c. and, ſet before the note of a larger number, ſubſtracts it ſelf, as IV, four, IX, nine. In the notes of the ancients, I. is put for Inter, intra, Junius, Julius; IA. P. Inter provinciam; I. AGL. In angulo; IA. D. Jam diu, jam dudum; IA. S. D. Jam ſatìs dandum; IA. RI. Jam reſpondi.

J j Engliſh and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as well as the reſt of their letters, a conſonant, and hath a name as ſuch, though in favour of pronunciation they ſometimes uſe it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its conſonant uſe, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the conſonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and Engliſh, and by ſome in Hebrew words, like a ſoft g; but very faultyly; except perhaps in deriveatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεῦ πάτερ, where it may be allowed that harder ſound; its true pronunciation being ſofter, and approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jahr, and our year being ſounded alike. The true ſound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the ſame ſyllable, and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we ſay, bé, cé, &c.
